Of all those experiments, blue fox fox farms are successfully conducted. On a somewhat smaller scale profitable fox farms are to be found on islands berado also has a new fox preserve. The smaller Alaskan islands, which are almost wholly unproductive, are leased the fur growers from the government for an annual rental of about $100 each. A pair of blue foxes may be purchased for $150 to $200, according to size and age. One of the most successful preserves was started with 104 foxes, and in five years there were 1,275 animals on the R. Sargent, who has been at Indian Head island. Notwithstanding the difficulties of the business, skunk farming has been tried in several of the States, and is now being carried on in Ohio, Indiana, and the Indian Territory, if not in other places.

About eight years ago a newspaper story, intended to be taken as a joke, started hundreds of people to inquiring about skunk farming, and induced many to actually engage in the business. This story purported to come from a high official in the Department of Agriculture. It declared that with a start of twenty skunks the natural increase in four years would be 3,780,000 skunks, worth a dollar aplece for hides and 50 cents an ounce for oil made from the fat. Col. Sellers never thought of a scheme in which there were so many millions.

One company formed in Pennsylvania spent $25,000 on a skunk farming experiment, based upon these remarkable figures, but had to give it up as a losing investment. Others went into the business on a smaller scale, and have continued, some of them making a fair return on their money. The Pennsylvania experiment started out with 300 skunks, in a twenty-acre inclosure. The promoters expected to have 2,000 animals by the next year, but instead there was a decrease. This led to a closer study of the habits of the animals, and they were found to be cannibals. The male skunks ate the young ones almost as soon as they were

The females and their young were then separated from the males, when it was discovered that they are each other's broods. The only successful method found was to put each female and her semi-annual litter in a separate inclosure, last evening, the fourteen-year-old daughwhich entailed an expense altogether too ter of John Bull, a farmer of Newmarket, great for the return in pelts and oil.
